Performance Highlights

In July, the Neuberger US Small Cap Intrinsic Value Fund USD I Accumulating Class (the "Fund") was down and underperformed the Russell 2000 Value Index (Total Return, Net of Tax, USD) (the "R2V" or the "Index") which was basically flat for the month. For the year to date, the Fund is in positive territory but lags the R2V.

US equity markets were mixed in July. AI/momentum names lagged and the Nasdaq fell while the Dow eked out a modest gain. Value stocks outperformed growth as investors reassessed AI capex winners following one of the steepest three-week momentum sell-offs on record.

Market Overview

Key drivers in July included a re-escalation of U.S.-Iran tensions that pushed oil above $100/barrel, and the Federal Reserve's decision to hold rates steady at its July Federal Open Market Committee (FOMC) meeting. Notably, the fundamental backdrop remains strong, indicating that valuation, positioning, and geopolitical concerns — rather than earnings weakness — drove the month's chopiness.

Portfolio Review

July's underperformance was due to both sector allocation and stock selection. The Fund's historical sector biases (overweight Infotech, underweights financials) hurt relative returns most. Four of the five worst performers were Infotech names – Veeco Instruments (VECO), ViaSat (VSAT), Rambus (RMBS) and IPG Photonics (IPGP). VECO fell significantly as investor risk aversion around a key customer's order push-out, margin pressure from rising costs, a broader semiconductor-equipment selloff and cooling AI capex optimism overwhelmed an otherwise strong 2026 run. VSAT declined on lingering fallout from a larger-than-expected fiscal Q4 loss and weak guidance, compounded by heavy insider selling, concerns over negative free cash flow amid roughly $1.2 billion in planned capex, and competitive/execution risk around its satellite rollout. RMBS gave back much of its prior rally, dropping significantly from its June peak despite record Q2 revenue and an EPS beat, as investors focused on shrinking net margins, a stretched valuation relative to larger AI chip peers, and a broader rotation out of high-multiple semiconductor names. IPGP's slide extended lingering damage from a weak Q1 report showing margin compression from tariffs and litigation costs and an EPS miss and was sharply amplified on July 7 by an 8% single-day drop tied to a sector-wide semiconductor selloff rather than any new company news.

Healthcare was a bright spot for the Fund. The portfolio's best performer, Haemonetics rose through July on an earnings beat with revenue up nearly 5% and improving margins, supported by favorable analyst ratings and a broader "profitable growth" narrative that reinforced confidence in the company's cash generation. Rogers extended a multi-quarter turnaround into July, with a strong year-to-date and one-year gain fueled by the company's return to profitability, margin expansion, and continued demand from industrial and AI/data-center-related electronics markets. Investor confidence was further supported by completion of a long-running share buyback program and stronger forward guidance for the next quarter. Stock selection in Materials also helped relative returns. Cleveland-Cliffs surged after reporting a sharp earnings inflection, with adjusted EBITDA nearly tripling and free cash flow turning positive, while management pointed to reinstated U.S. steel tariffs as a macro tailwind curbing imports and supporting domestic steel pricing. Despite the overall negative impact from the portfolio's Infotech stocks, there were some strong performers. GitLab climbed on a quarterly earnings and revenue beat, roughly 23% year-over-year revenue growth, and continued profitable guidance, with sentiment further lifted by analyst price target.

We increased our exposure to several existing holdings with attractive risk/reward profiles.

Outlook

US equities could continue to move higher this year, driven primarily by earnings—concentrated in AI infrastructure, data-center build-out, and energy-related names. The Fed's shift from a dovish stance to holding rates steady means equities may not get a monetary-easing tailwind this year. Other near-term risks include narrow market leadership and stretched valuations in mega-cap AI names, a strained consumer facing negative real wage growth, and the possibility that any inflation surprise triggers renewed rate hike risk.
